Orienteering is the sport of navigating a course, usually in a wilderness setting, by using a topographical map and a compass. Each participant is given a map with a series of "control points" marked on it. The object of the event is to find the marker placed in the terrain at each control point, punch a scorecard to verify having found each point, and complete the course.

Courses are offered at all levels of ability. Beginner instruction is available throughout the event. Participants can compete against others at their level or recreational.

Compasses are available for rent at a dollar each. A typical course takes from 1 to 2½ hours to complete.
